The number of American households without a bank account last year fell to the lowest level since 2009, in part because people opened accounts during the pandemic to get financial help. says a new report. This is according to the latest report of the Federal Insurance Corporation households with and without a bank account. About 45% of households that received a stimulus payment, unemployment benefit or other government support after the pandemic began in March 2020 said the funds helped them open an account, according to a biennial report that dates back to 2009. "Safe and accessible bank accounts provide more Americans with access to the banking system and will continue to play an important role in promoting the economic inclusion of all Americans," FDIC Acting President Martin J. Gruenberg said in a statement. The lack of banking options has prevented some households from receiving federal payments to help the state weather the economic fallout of the COVID-19 health crisis. In low-income communities, checks were delayed for some unbanked payers: for unbanked Americans, pandemic checks came slowly and at a higher cost. But that may change. The FDIC has launched an education campaign to encourage more Americans to open an account to deposit these funds directly. And banks like Capital One and Ally Financial have ended overdraft and other fees that have been a major barrier for some Americans to access the banking system. What does it mean not to have a bank account? A household is considered unbanked if no one in the household has a bank or credit union account. Since 2009, this percentage has almost halved. He says that since 2011, when 8 percent of US households did not have a bank account, the highest since the survey began and hit a record low in 2021, about half of the decline is due to changes in the financial health of US households. FDIC. Subbanks represented 14% of American households, or 18.7 million, year. Why do people have little or no access to banking services? Many of those without access to banking services report that they cannot afford to open an account due to insufficient funding and overdraft fees charged when the account balance is insufficient. Some 29% cited fees or a lack of required minimum balance as the top reasons for not having a checking or savings account, compared to 38% who cited these barriers in 2019. Unused banks were higher in working-age and disabled households with low incomes, including single mothers, blacks, or Hispanics. For example, among white households, 2% were unbanked last year, compared with 11% and 9% of black and Hispanic households, respectively. Meanwhile, almost 15% of households with able-bodied persons with disabilities were unbanked, compared to almost 4% of other households. And nearly 16% of single mother households did not have a bank account, compared to about 2% of married couples who did not have a bank account. "These gaps show that there is still plenty of room to increase public participation in the banking system," Keith Ernst, the FDIC's deputy director of consumer research and analytics, said at a news conference about the report. Will the number of unbanked increase as the US enters a recession? Maybe. "During the last recession, interest rates for non-banks really went up," Karen Chu, director of banking research at the Center for Financial Research, said in a telephone interview. compared to those with a single head of household.
